Taiwan Steps Up

(Modified and cited from Time, 2005)

Taiwan is the world's premier electronics factory, but the world doesn't know it. Most of this digital gear is made under contracts with big foreign tech companies, like HP, Apple and Dell and is resold to consumers carrying those well-known brand names. However, the relentless decline in tech hardware prices is putting pressure on the bottom line—profit margins on a Taiwan-made notebook PC, for example, have fallen by half, to 5%, over the past three years.

Earlier this month, Taiwan consumer-electronics company BenQ, a relatively unknown maker of everything from notebook to LCD TVs to MP3 players, agreed to acquire the mobile-phone business of German behemoth Siemens, thereby becoming the world's fourth-largest mobile-phone company with total annual revenues of nearly $11 billion. Not only is the firm gaining size, it is gaining marketplace visibility. BenQ gets to use the top-notch Siemens brand name for five years. "To be in the global market, you need to have global scale," said K.Y.Lee, the CEO of BenQ.

Of course, selling household-name merchandise to the world does not guarantee success. Companies with great brands and global reach can still lose money. But a well-respected brand can often persuade customers to pay more for its products, which helps maintain margins in the fight against lesser-known rivals. Without brands, Taiwan's contract manufacturers are forced to compete with one another almost exclusively on prices as they seek to land deals to supply the Apples and HPs of the world and that kills profits.
