Westerners is the savory Asian morning meals that a Korean or Japanese person could just as well have for lunch or dinner. 2, Westerners tend toward sweet foods like sugary cereals, syrup-laden pancakes or at least a smattering of jam on toast.

Eating preferences are conditioned early on by 3 scientists call "prenatal flavor learning," followed by habits taught in childhood. Nevertheless, some describe a person's dietary choices as one of the last bastions of individual control. Some eat for health, others for sensory 4; some shop locally, others revel in exotic possibilities from around the world. We have stereotypes of waiflike vegetarians, aggressive carnivores, careless junk-food devourers and obsessive calorie counters. Although globalization has brought us copious choices of foods and ways to 5 them, it has also complicated the seemingly innocent question of what's for dinner.

(B) "I have learned a great deal from listening carefully. Most people never listen," Ernest Hemingway said, and he was right. We give importance to speaking our minds but often forget the value of listening.

We "hear" things, but they may go in one ear and out the other. Listening, 6, requires attention and concentration. It's the ability to receive messages accurately. Because misunderstandings happen when people don't listen carefully, listening, 7 talking, is the key to effective communication.

How do we become better listeners? First, show respect. Don't 8 the speaker, and keep an open mind even if you disagree with the speaker's views. Second, try to talk less than you listen. Though it may take practice, control your 9 to frequently weigh in, and speak only when the moments seem right.

When those right moments might be depends on the conversation. In general, good listeners don't jump in with their opinions or advice. 10, they might ask questions that draw information from the speaker. This information may then help the speaker recognize problems and solutions.

10. A. Unexpectedly B. Besides C. Instead D. Nevertheless

(C) Polar bears are among the most recognizable animals on Earth. They are known for their broad shoulders, large paws, and white fur, 11 the impression of huge stuffed animals. These enormous beasts are only cute from a distance, though. In fact, they are the world's largest land 12, and have been known to eat humans. A full grown male can be between 350 and 500 kilograms, with females generally being half that size. Though they will eat virtually anything, most of their diet consists of seals. They often catch seals as the latter come up for air or to take a rest. Polar bears are also strong swimmers, a skill they use to travel between large packs of floating ice or hunt for food.

Polar bears are well adapted to their cold 13. Their fur is warm and waterproof, their bodies have a thick layer of blubber, and even the shape of their head and neck protects them from the cold. A small head results in giving off less heat, and a long neck gives the cold Arctic air a chance to warm up before hitting the bear's lungs.

14 global warming, however, all those adaptations may not be enough. Arctic ice is melting and not returning, which is making it difficult for polar bears to hunt. Today there are between 25,000 and 35,000 of these beautiful animals left in the wild, but the population is 15 rapidly. A changing environment could mean polar bears will disappear forever, which would be a real shame. They are majestic animals that should be cherished and protected for future generations.
