The traditional discussion on executive-legislative relations is building on the separation of powers and the fusion of powers and takes the US model of presidentialism and the British model of parliamentarism as two typical examples. Some studies of executive-legislative relations, however, focus on realistic interbranch transactions, which to some extent interact with the party system. How do the interactions between the executive-legislative structure and the party system influence government performance (e.g., accountability, responsiveness, and representation)?
