Sir Hilary identified the moral and physical defense of the archives as being the archivist's primary duty. By moral defense he meant that archives must be cared for in ways that safeguard their authenticity and preserve their context and links to other records and hence ensure their usability, their capacity to fulfill the administrative, legal and social roles defined above. By physical defense he meant the physical care and security required for long-term preservation.

Jenkinson's dictum has significant implications for the appraisal and selection of records of continuing value and for issues of transmission, custody and ownership as well as for their management in archival custody.
