Archives are the raw material of history. They represent the collective memory of a nation, institution or individual. In the first instance records are created for administrative, legal or personal reasons but once this immediate usefulness has diminished records may become archives providing evidence of past events. They are essential for historical research but archives also have an important role to play in providing evidence for the accountability of public institutions, decision-makers and opinion-formers. Archival material need not be old to be of importance: some records have an archival value the moment they are created.
