Back in 2013, Eler wrote a piece titled "The Feminist Politics of Selfies," focusing on POC women and selfies, in response to an article that suggested selfies are a cry for help, among a plethora of negative slanting media coverage. "Actually can we talk about what selfies mean to people who never get a chance to see themselves in mainstream media?" wrote feminist comic book author Kendall. While posting selfies publicly exposes the person to hate speech, it also connects them with a global network can't blame people for wanting validation, and now it's just a swipe and a tap away.

of potential support. With the rise of the selfie, images of marginalized others that were once kept out of the mainstream have become iconic.

Of course, there's a drawback that has become all too apparent in recent years: surveillance. Despite revelations of spying by the National Security Agency on ordinary American citizens, or the fact that our personal information is mined and sold by large social media corporations, we seem undeterred from posting our most personal moments for all to see. We love to selfie, even if our own images are monetized for the profit of others, our every online action is monitored, and our movements tracked by the very tools that connect us.

"The threat is not a digital one so much as it is a personal one," writes Eler. There is a pervasive attitude of "I have nothing to hide," but that reality is different for those same activists and artists who may be empowered by the visibility that selfies offer. Working under the constraints of surveillance in an age where visibility translates to political power forces dissident movements to be fluid in their approach because their digital footprint may be used against them. __(3)__

How can selfies and online activism make a difference? In this December 2017 interview with Prince Harry for BBC Radio 4, former US President Barack Obama said that in order for online movements to have an impact in the real world, communities need to "move offline." It's easy to be a hateful troll or an outspoken political opponent veiled by the anonymity of the Internet, Obama told the prince, but when you sit down with someone over a pint the complexities of their being are more apparent, and you might be able to connect with someone unexpected. If not, our ideas are only reinforced by the feedback loop of social media. __(4)__
